It's a file extension. These are the most commonly used styles for introductions in blog posts. The first one is short and to the point, while the second one is more informative, with some factual content. The third is an example of what not to do - it has no introduction, meaning there's no hook for the body of the post! It's best if your introductions are some combination of these two styles - they'll make it easier to remember what you've written once you start writing your post. 2. Bloggers have a bad habit of using caps for their first names, usually B. They're a terrible way to start a blog post as the first thing a reader sees. Use a title tag to replace it with your correct name. It'll help you from being dismissed as some random person who likes to make up fancy titles, which you will do more of if you don't use one of these tags! 3. There's no real reason for this but I'm going to make an example of it anyway: 4. Avoid using "The". It's not necessary. 5. Be sure to use the right image tag - the image size is really important for SEO. If your image is too small, you're not just wasting space - Google will be less likely to pick up on it, starting it at a disadvantage relative to other images. If it's too large, you'll have to make your post look ugly or break it down into smaller bits which will make the page load slow. 6. This is a small one, but I've seen several blogs use "is" when they meant "are". That particular mistake is easy to spot, but don't assume that everyone else will catch on to it! 7. If you're experimenting with HTML, remember that is the command that makes text italicized. Don't go thinking that just because you're using tags on unfamiliar websites, you can break the rules! 8. We all know you're trying to be funny, but try not to use so many inside jokes in conversation. Most of the time your friends will forget them and the people who do get it will feel left out. Save it for when you need a little mirth and some laughs. 9. Some bloggers like to comment on their experience with an item or service. They'll visit a restaurant or visit a store and then post their comment on how they felt about that particular experience later on.
